Uncertain Horizons: Navigating Worries about the Future in 2014.

I had concerns about how people perceived me and what my future held. I wondered how people would identify me and what they would say about me. My leg, whether I had it on or not, seemed to be a topic of notice for others. Even in my junior years at VBM school, I experienced instances where someone would point at me and make comments. It hurt me, but I tried to quickly forget about it as it had become somewhat routine for me.

My environment had a significant impact on me and brought about changes in my behavior and interactions. During my time at VBM school, I was mostly alone until a certain age, but then I started engaging in conversations with some girls. I developed a dislike for speaking with boys during that period. I had a fear of being teased or insulted by them.

However, I want to acknowledge that no one has ever insulted me or treated me poorly, despite the occasional disagreements and conflicts I may have had with others. While there may have been instances in the past where people have engaged in such behavior, I am proud to say that the majority of students from Jenifer, VBM, and Joseph schools, where I have been, have treated me with respect and kindness. The only exception to this was a specific incident involving the VBM school madam who insulted me.

I'm glad to hear that your 28 classmates at VBM school were very nice to you. It's heartening to know that you had a positive experience with them. Similarly, it's great that you felt accepted and supported at Joseph's school, where everyone treated you well.

Having such positive experiences and a supportive environment can be incredibly beneficial for personal growth and development. It's important to have clarity about your goals and aspirations, as well as the reasons behind them. This clarity will guide you in making choices and decisions that align with your ambitions. Remember, it's okay to prioritize your own well-being and work towards your goals. Focus on nurturing yourself, honing your skills, and striving for the life you envision.
